A little bit of history

Built in 1848 – seven years after the first train had arrived in Brighton from London, dragging the centre of town towards the station – 36, Trafalgar Street was built.

The building has always been a pub and was first occupied by beer retailer Thomas Edelston who named it The Lord Nelson in 1854, presumably because he was a fan of the man himself and the pub sat on Trafalgar Street.

The Lord Nelson was built very much in the style of the time with separate smoking room – though you could smoke anywhere – and public and private bars and a Bottle & Jug. You can still see where the divide between the public and private bars was as the partition remains, just inside the main entrance. The upper half of the building is original Victorian but the tiles were added between wars.

Harvey's bought the pub from Charrington in 1980 and extended the bar through to the lower level shortly afterwards and further extended the pub, first by building the conservatory in 2000, then building into the electrical shop in 2016.

Our thanks to Rob at Beer and Brew for the above information.
